LinkedIn has been sued by four individuals who claim that the professional networking site hacked into their accounts in order to send invitations to their friends.

The lawsuit said that LinkedIn violates the federal wiretap laws as well as California privacy laws. The plaintiff accused that when the site demands user's email, it does not make clear that it'll send invitation.

Plaintiff's attorney said that for years, people have been complaining about LinkedIn marketing practice.

The plaintiffs are seeking class-action status, with the hope of defining the plaintiff class as any member registered with LinkedIn prior to May 15, 2013, whose identity was used in endorsement emails.

The suit state that it is unlawful to send advertisement emails to users implicating that the member is endorsing LinkedIn without the member consent.

Meanwhile, LinkedIn spokesperson Mr. Doug Madey said that the company is transparent about protecting member privacy and data and also added that the legal claims in the lawsuit are without merit and the company will fight it.
